

Holocene Park: Volume One - All for show

Jane has always loved animals. When her teacher an eco-firebrand suggests she do her school project on animal communication, it seems an easy option. Her neighbour, Chris, is a wildlife cameraman. He suggests she start by watching her parents dogs, Mouse, Sassy, and Zoe. Jane is more interested in gorillas and polar bears, and eventually persuades Chris to take her along as an assistant on his trips. Mouse is relieved, since the dogs have enough to worry about without humans discovering what theyre up to. Dogs are the interface between the human and animal worlds, and the animals are worried. Humans are changing the planet and climate much faster than their normal process of R&D (evolution) can cope with. With several thousand species becoming extinct every year, there is no time to lose. The animals have set up a series of top-secret laboratories to work on adapting their DNA. But they have a series of urgent problems to overcome spearheaded by Chris dog, Patch - including how to transfer complex information like DNA patterns from one lab to another, how to decode a message which could mean the difference between survival or extinction for polar bears, and how to cope with a security breach, where seeds containing animal DNA have accidentally been sent to a public garden. And how to avoid humans realising the animals can understand every word they say. Patch is convinced that human technology can be used to save them, and secretly co-opts Chris filming trips. After a couple of chaotic failures, his work pays off, with a flock of starlings mapping out dozens of DNA displays for the cameras, with few humans realising that anything unusual is happening. Decoding the message which will save polar bears proves just as difficult, and it is not until Zoe finally cracks it that the bears can be given the instructions which will ensure their future survival. However, along with the successes come increasing worries about security. Once Patch lets slip to Jane and Chris that he can understand their speech, the animals have to decide whether to seek their cooperation in the struggle for survival. Human involvement on previous occasions led to disaster, but could Chris technical know-how and Janes increasingly passionate commitment be just the boost their battle needs? (To be continued)
