

Fire Prevention (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Fire Prevention For twelve years, save for a few months, Edward F. Croker was Chief of the largest and best fire department in the world, that of New York City. For fifteen years before he attained the rank of Chief he had served in that department in all its grades. Such a life story means but one thing; an experience with fire unique in its richness and variety. Ex-Chief Croker has probably seen more fire than any other man in this country - he has undoubtedly directed the attack against this dangerous and versatile adversary more often than any other living man. To him fire-fighting became life. It was a real battle, into the fortunes of which he cast not only his remarkable vitality and courage, but also the growing weight of his knowledge. With the whole force of his personality he studied his opponent and worsted him in thousands of engagements. After he had battled continuously for twenty-seven years, this rugged fighter retired from the fray, unvanquished, only to take his familiar enemy upon the flank, as it were.
