Not illustrated. 1855 Excerpt: ...be acknowledged by all who have read the history of colonization. We know that the human body, whether in health or disease, is capable of generating a fever producing poison: how careful, therefore, ought we to be to avoid those conditions necessary to such an undesirable end, and especially when we know that the surrounding air is in a state ready to receive the germ and bring it forth to perfection. We shall see in the sequel what were the characteristics of the climate of Greece, and how that it was not the only cause of the different diseases with which its inhabitants were afflicted. THE PESTILENTIAL CONSTITUTION. We now come to a subject, which, perhaps, at this present time will greatly interest us, namely, The Pestilential Constitution (KaraaTaotc Xo/iai&c of Galen). We shall find on comparing the atmospheric phenomena grouped under the above title with those prevalent at different times, when this and other countries have been visited by plagues and other destructive epidemics, many interesting points of resemblance which, until placed side by side, would fail to strike the observer as features significant of a strong family likeness between one epidemic constitution and another. These features, modified, as those of the human race are, by climate, yet preserve their grand characteristic outline, so that it is not difficult to recognise them when we consider all the sources of their modification. As an introduction to this last part of my work, I shall briefly give a sketch of the more salient characters of the CLIMATE OF GREECE. The physical features of Greece present every diversity of character, and this difference of conformation between the several provinces was a powerful cause of the variety both in the inhabitants and the ...
